The Wrong Kind of Flower

Finlay sat next to the fish tank. He liked watching the fish. They were more interesting than the teacher.

There was a little bridge at the bottom of the fish tank. But the fish never swam under it. Or maybe they did when Finlay wasn't looking.

The big fish was swimming very near the bridge now.

"Go on!" Finlay whispered. "Swim under it!"

The teacher was talking to the class. "Tomorrow, I want you all to bring in a flower for the nature table," she said. "It can be any kind of flower."

Finlay watched the big fish. It swam over the bridge.

"Finlay!" said the teacher. "What did I just say?"

"Any kind of flower," said Finlay.

"Yes," said the teacher. "And stop staring at the fish!"

"Did you all remember to bring in a flower?" asked the teacher the next day.

Most of the class had.

Sally Wong had a marigold.

David Simmons had a rose. A lot of it had been eaten by greenfly.

Ruth Goodchild had a pansy. She had some extra flowers for the teacher too.

The teacher filled a jam jar with water. She put it on the nature table. "Now, all put your flowers in here," she said.

Sally Wong put in the marigold.

David Simmons put in what was left of the rose.

Ruth Goodchild put in the pansy.

"Please, Miss," she said. "Look what Finlay's doing."

The teacher looked at Finlay. He was pouring some white stuff out of a bag into the water.

"What are you doing, Finlay?" asked the teacher.

"Putting my flour in the water, like you said, Miss," said Finlay.

"That's the wrong kind of flour," said the teacher.
She had to change the water.
