The Koala Problem

In icy Antarctica, white, fluffy polar bears looked for their prey whilst short penguins walked across the snow. The sun was up in the sky until a brown, large boat floated on the ocean. Near the back of the boat, sat some strange creatures that don't belong in Antarctica. Their shadow grey bodies had tinsy tiny tails as small as ants on the bottom of their back. Their faces had small eyes and big ears on their top of their heads and lighter faces. What could the creatures be? It was two metium sized koalas with... lime green aliens! What an astonishing sight on this fine morning!

Eventually, the loving koalas investigated their weird, magical surroundings. Suddenly, the koala's tummys began to rumble loudly but they had no idea that fruit didn't grow in Antarctica. What would those poor marsupials put in their cute mouths now? Until midnight came, the koalas searched high and low and if they spotted a place they haven't looked at they would sprint to look there. With hesetation, the koalas sobbed "We're awfully hungry and there's not a single tree of fruit in Antarctica!" The crying hoped to return back to Australia with the warm sun and not with the clouds dropping snow. Ethusiastically, they set sail in their trusted, enormous boat but they realised that their loved homeland was more than a miles away.

A second had past, and the sea began to get rougher and the waves got higher. The koalas began to feel sick, since the boat started to sway side to side with danger. The shadow grey creatures knew that their boat was way quicker than trying to swim, which made their journey home much more successful. Whilst the koalas were sailing home, their alien friends appeared in the sky above them. The koalas signalled for help until the alien friends beamed them up on their UFO. The aliens transported them back to their homeland and enjoyed a fruit and jelly bean feast.